How shutdown orders affect restaurants, state economy

President and CEO of the CRA, Jot Condie, spoke to Capital Public Radio this morning about the ongoing struggle of restaurants, who have been ordered to close indoor dining statewide — again.

“Rents, taxes, fees, government assessments that have been postponed, that’s going to come due, so those bills are piling up, even when the revenue’s not coming in.” — President and CEO of the California Restaurant Association, Jot Condie.

Wearing masks is now the most important thing for the economy, says Dallas Fed chief

"The main message I'd have today about the economy from here and how to grow it probably has to do with managing this virus," he told Fox Business in an interview Friday morning. "While monetary and fiscal policy are very important, they're not as important right now as us doing a good job flattening the curve on this virus. If we do that, we'll grow faster."

News You Need to Know: Indoor dining must close statewide

Gov. Gavin Newsom has announced a broad, statewide order to close California businesses once again as the state struggles to control the spread of the coronavirus. The new order will impact hair salons, other personal care businesses, non-critical office settings, shopping malls, and more. Additionally, an order that was first issued two weeks ago that shut down indoor dining in many counties has now been expanded and will apply statewide. That means restaurants in California can only operate outdoor dining, delivery, and to-go service. Yet, restaurants will be one of a shrinking number of businesses allowed to operate at all.
