Communities Working to Support Black-owned Businesses

Lists of black-owned restaurants are being published in cities around the country as the public looks for ways to show support. Does it solve the kind of racial injustice highlighted by the death of George Floyd? No, but it’s one way to show support and share a positive message. We’re sharing stories from two California cities here:

- Sacramento
Los Angeles

The National Restaurant Association has shared resources that restaurants can use to support the black community and engage in the nationwide conversation about race.

Restaurants hit with looting, vandalism after protests
Just as restaurants were beginning to reopen, some were damaged by vandalism and looting over the last week.

“We had employees who were like we'll stay here; we'll defend the place,” Caitlin Cutler, co-owner of Ronan, told the Los Angeles Times. “And, we were like no, no, no, go home. We did put up signs that said: ‘We stand with you, black lives matter.’”

In-store retail, outdoor dining, religious services, to resume in Santa Clara County
Santa Clara County was the first county in the country to issue shelter-in-place orders in March, in response to the coronavirus outbreak. Restaurants here will be able to move toward a limited reopening – reopening outdoor dining – this Friday.

News You Need to Know: LA County reopening restaurants, House passes changes to PPP

As we told our members Friday, LA County restaurants are now able to move forward with modified reopening. The timing of this otherwise welcome announcement suddenly feels odd: many restaurants may not move forward with this right now because of the ongoing risk of damage from break-ins and looting happening in many cities. However, if you've been wanting to review guidelines in LA County or elsewhere, check out local and state reopening information, here, on the CRA website.

Meanwhile, the US House of Representatives has passed a bill that would bring much-needed changes to the Paycheck Protection Program. Now, we wait to see what the US Senate will do.
