Newsom orders bars closed in 7 California counties, including L.A., due to coronavirus spread

In another sign of the growing worry over increasing cases of coronavirus, Gov. Gavin Newsom on Sunday ordered the closure of bars in seven counties. In a separate group of counties, the state is recommending bars close, but leaving the decision to county officials.

San Francisco pauses next phase of reopening as California coronavirus cases climb

"Yesterday we saw 103 cases. On June 15, when we first reopened outdoor dining and in-store retail, we had 20," San Francisco Mayor London Breed wrote on Twitter. "At our current rate, the number could double rapidly. If that continues & we don't intervene, we'll be at such a high number that our only option would be to shut down."

News You Need to Know: Wear a mask + ask guests to wear a mask

Gov. Gavin Newsom announced Sunday that in seven counties, bars are being ordered to shut down, only 10 days after they were allowed to reopen. Other states, too, are scaling back parts of their reopening. What can Californians do to help keep communities and businesses open? Studies say that one key step is to wear a mask.
